

COVERED WITH GEMS

Worth Millions of Dollars, the Shah of Persia is Early Dazzling England.

HIS VERY PECULIAR WAYS

About as Big a Feature of His Visit to the British Isles.

HE ENJOYS HIMSELF AT THE RACES.

A Man Found Who Would Give Over a Million for His Majesty's Jewels—Some of the Most Valuable of the Persian Monarch.

Instead of dazzling the Shah of Persia upon his visit to England, His Majesty has turned the tables and is doing the dazzle act himself, the number and value of the jewels he wears being something remarkable.

LONDON, July 6.—[Copyrighted.]—It is necessary to do more than make one the Shah, for England has done nothing but feast him, stare at him, run after him, and talk and write about him all week.

A GREAT GOLD FIELD.

Bates Dorsey Tells of the Riches of the Johannesburg Field—The Yield of the Various Veins—Unskilled Labor Plentiful.

besides which he has a tremendous quantity of brilliant in his hat and strings of precious stones scattered all over him.

What His Majesty is Doing. The Shah has done all kind of things since he has been here; most of which you have heard about.

On Thursday, at the Prince of Wales' garden party, the Shah met General Boulanger, but according to a friend who witnessed the interview, the brave General does not seem to have created a very strong impression.

A Waters' Notice Succeeded. The waiter at the Lord Mayor's luncheon made a good thing of the royal presence.

Many of the endless stories told about the Shah are good, but unfortunately not suited to the eyes or ears of young persons, and therefore cannot be printed.

she was too old; that he had met her too late in life to be interesting.

It is also said, though perhaps it is not true, that having dined on three occasions with the same princess, duchess, and other familiar objects, he appeared to be very Prince of Wales to order in another lot of women to dinner, as he had seen all these before.

A Peculiar Manner of Hunting. Lord Castletown considers that the Shah is a great sportsman, and writes him up from that point of view in New Zealand.

This old man—whose costume, by the way, must be something like a cross between that of a London Tower best-eater and the average tenor with his boots, in a suit of tweed and a bowler hat.

A Very Interesting Feature of the Shah's retinue and one which excites much sympathy among women, is a little boy about 15, who nearly always drives by with His Majesty.

Any number of English towns and English functionaries, of various sorts, are striving for a chance to do something to be agreeable, and Nasr-ed-Din is evidently in for a good time, as long as he chooses to remain.
